Few professions offer the opportunities, challenges and rewards available to people working in the health, aged care and disability services industries.

Employment opportunities in these vital sectors are strong, varied and transferable. And best of all, a qualification in one of these areas will be highly sought after, with the sectors being considered as some of Tasmania's (and Australia's) largest employment growth areas.

Depending on your area of interest, there are a wide range of course options available for you to study at TasTAFE. These include qualifications that prepare you for a career as:

- an enrolled nurse or dental assistant
- support worker, personal care assistant, house manager, leisure and health coordinator
- team leader, program or service coordinator, case manager or manager.

Employment in these, or similar roles, will offer you the chance to work in a variety of locations and service environments, including hospitals, primary and community health, aged care (residential and community), and mental health settings, as well as shared homes, leisure and lifestyle programs, individual support services (in the home or community), community access programs, case management, employment support services and advocacy organisations.

If you choose to pursue a career in these sectors, you will have the chance to make a real difference in people's everyday lives, and get to work with like-minded people and other professionals while you do it.

So, if you enjoy working with other people, helping others and you are prepared to work hard, then undertaking a qualification in these areas may well be the right option for you!

"During the course we learnt care techniques and how to use the equipment. The role-plays were really valuable because they helped give me an idea of what it would be like to work in the industry."
